Arrived there, they all got out of the carriage and walked toward the build-carriage and walked toward the building. James was leading the way. When twenty feet from the door, without warning or hint of any kind, he wheeled sharply and fled toward a clump of trees in the distance.

The father and brother were so surprised that they could not move. When they were able to pursue the fleeing boy he was so far ahead of them that they had no chance to catch him, and he soon was out of sight.

The sanitarium authorities were netified and they sent out a lot of men to look for the boy, but no trace of him was found. The father and brother remained in Stamford all the next day and then returned to their home in Newark, convinced that something had happened to James.

Iteturn for Mother's Sake.

In the hope, however, that he might have escaped to some town where he would see the newspapers, Mr. Mc-wind devertised for him, begging him to return for his mother's size. This the boy saw, and he came home yesterday. His mother had not been informed that he had run away, so that his reappearance saved her from any grief. Mr. McWhood, who is in the book-binding business at No. 75 John street, said this morning that his son had gone to Massachusetts after running away, but he did not wish to say any more for fear that the notoriety would hurt his son's future.

He added, however, that the boy would the back in college very soon, as his little trip had done him so much good that it would not be necessary to send him to a sanitarium. Return for Mother's Sake.
